

Review on [REDACTED] Oped

[REDACTED] opinion was that tardiness is unacceptable, and overall, just not cool. This was very clear, considering the fact that she flat out stated it in the very beginning. She supports this opinion by using "real life" examples of what might happen if someone is tardy. Although the examples were supposed to represent real life, they definitely were not realistic, because they were stick figures, and there were only a couple different scenarios, which caused them to seem less supportive. The style [REDACTED] used was simply drawings and text to go with them. Overall, I thought that the drawings were very creative, but the excessive amount of reading and whatnot became tiresome and boring after some time. I thought that a lot of the editing choices were quite detracting from the oped. For example, when she began to talk about how it is acceptable for certain famous people to be late, I thought that she was getting rather off track from her originally stated opinion. Another example of poor choices in the editing of the oped was when she began to talk about little kids needing their mommies. Although she tried to stay on track and connect it to her opinion, that part of the oped was very distracting to me, and during the part about the celebrities, I nearly forgot what the actual opinion was. There were a couple of technical aspects that I also thought detracted from the quality of the oped. One of those things was choosing the yellow font, because it was very hard to read, especially against the lighter pictures. Another thing that distracted me, and lessened the quality of this video, was the amount of simple punctuation errors. I think that having proper punctuation is a very important skill in any sort of writing, advertising, or in this case, creating an oped. You will seem more credible if you have good grammar. I think people are more likely to take your opinion seriously if you do not have any sort of spelling, punctuation or grammar errors. However, there were also a number of positive things that contributed to the oped as a whole. For one, the song was perfect for the idea in this particular oped. Another thing was the expressions with the drawings, and how clean and clear the drawings looked. (they were not too dark or messy, and if they were filmed, the camera was kept very still). Something I personally thought was great about this oped was that it was very humorous, which kept me interested throughout the whole thing. Some things that could be improved about this oped are, like I said before, some of the editing choices. This oped is definitely unique because of the hand-drawn pictures, and the humor within them. Some adjectives that come to mind in this oped are: humorous, creative, well thought out, and overall, very clever. This oped tells me that the author does not like tardiness, but does like Channing Tatum.
